A: I see a lot of tags, which lead me to believe that this was done through a JS injection attack. The problem with that is you can't have a server command the client to load a JS file and execute it. If the server were to do this, the client would execute the JS and it would be broken. I do find it strange that you don't have a single image tag in the HTML (either inline or background), which lead me to believe that the image does not come from the HTML. If I was to look at your page, I would recommend that your site be scanned for the use of Google Captcha, something that you can preform using a tool like Sitecheck. In addition, if you are using Chrome, you should try enabling the Chrome Web Developer Toolbar. You can use this to see where your files are located, what request they are making, and even see the response. The next thing I would recommend is changing the IP you are using. If you are using the IP that your domain uses, and the only thing different about it is it is registered to you, you are putting yourself at a massive disadvantage. If the attacker controls a domain that uses your IP, they can control that domain. With this, the attacker can control what requests you are making, and where they end up. I would recommend looking into the IP you are using. If you are using a dynamic IP (and I believe you are), there are services that will hide your IP and will allow you to keep all your domains in one IP. If your domains using static IP addresses, as far as getting IPs go, I am not sure. Most ISPs allow you to obtain an IP in a few different ways. However, if you are using any type of dynamic IP like you say you are, you might as well change it, and if your ISP still uses port 80, you should still be able to access your content using your current IP.
